GOLF AND HOW TO PLAY IT
By Chas Chick Evans Jr.

Learn to Putt
The average golf professional takes his pupil out to the practice grounds for the first lesson and places a driver in his hands. The beginner finds that hitting a driver club is a hard one for the beginner and that frequently he is unable by its use to get the ball into the air. When that is the case, the instructor knowing that sending the ball in the air is the greatest joy of the beginning golfer, substitutes the mid-iron for the driver, for almost anyone can hit that club, at least occasionally, with that club.

Always, however, the teacher and pupil keep in mind the idea that the drive is the foundation stroke of the game. This manner of instruction has been adopted, I think, because the tee shot is the first shot of the game, and it is generally thought that the player should take the club in the order in which they are used on the course. It makes a man feel that he is advancing steadily to the time when he can play each shot as needful in a round, beginning with a tee shot and ending with the putt that may or may not be needed to put the ball into the hole.

Putting Stroke Different
Some doubtless once upon a time ventured the suggestion that the stroke to learn first is the putt. There is much in this because about 40 percent of the strokes made in a round are taken on the putting green and the putting stroke is entirely unrelated to any other stroke in golf.

While working out my own game I soon realized that if I expected to develop a consistent and reliable golf game I must learn to systematically my shots, making all as nearly alike as possible. With certain general principles governing stance and grip following this theory I have been able to work out a consistent game. My drives are under good control. And, therefore, I think that my theory in regard to the practice of these shots is correct.

System Falls on Putt
By closely relating them I was able to obtain given results, with the smallest expenditure of effort. I tried to carry out this idea in the putt and failed, for try as I might nothing I had learned in the use of wooden clubs or irons brought results on the putting green. Trying to relate the putting stroke with the other golf strokes resulted in years of unintelligent practice, for the putting stroke cannot be brought within the perfectly systematized method of my play.

All the other strokes belong together. In fact, they are merely modifications of one stroke. Yet when a man reaches the green he might as well forget every stroke he has used between the tee and that spot. Therefore, I think it better to learn this unrelated stroke first. Since, therefore, any preconception as to grip and stance gained from using other clubs.
